Tuesday, 26 July - The Brooklyn Tour

Departs from Pier 16 at 6:15pm

(at the end of Fulton Street, South Street Seaport)

Featuring Brooklyn's Maritime Heritage & Future - Brooklyn Navy Yard to Sunset Park

This tour goes north (actually east) on the East River to the former Brooklyn Navy Yard, passing under the Brooklyn and Manhattan Bridges. The Navy Yard has three large graving docks and an active shipyard, as well as the home port of FDNY's fireboat division. We then travel south along the Brooklyn waterfront, passing the new Brooklyn Bridge Park and the Red Hook Container Terminal, Atlantic Basin, and Erie Basin, home of Hughes Brothers Barges and Reinauer Tugs. We continue into Gowanus Bay and along the Sunset Park waterfront, home of the former large Bush Terminals. We then cross over to the Statue of Liberty at sunset for a moment before returning to Pier 16.

Harbor FAQ: What is the difference between a boat and a ship?

There is no precise distinction between a boat and a ship. It's more a matter of custom and usage. Size also matters, but size alone can be confusing. Back in the middle of the last millennium, ships were generally quite small, often under 100 feet, and would today be smaller than many boats.

One definition asserts that "a ship can carry a boat but a boat cannot carry a ship". But even that doesn't work: today's large freighters could easily carry several dozen Santa Marias or Mayflowers on their decks. Following are a few other rules of thumb, which will serve to confuse the issue even more:

In the US Navy, all submarines are called boats, regardless of size, except for Trident and Polaris class submarines, which are called ships. Lightships are ships but fireboats are boats. Have you ever heard of a fireship? Tugboats are also boats. Police boats and work boats are all boats. In fact, most boats are boats.

Sailboats (except tall ships) are boats. Most tall ships are ships, except for smaller ones.

of course. Therefore, tall ships are simply large sail boats, except when they are not larger. Kayaks, gigs, canoes and skiffs are all boats, certainly not ships.

Barges are neither boats nor ships: they are barges. Except, of course, for a captain's barge or an admiral's barge, which are both small motorboats.

The word "ship" also refers to a type of tall ship which carries three or more masts, all fitted with square sails. Other types of tall ships include bark, barkentine, brig, brigantine, and schooner, to name a few.

The rule of thumb is, basically, if she looks like a ship, she is a ship.
